(2022)

Richard Whalley

Erysichthon's Forest

for soprano, bass, cello and piano

Programme note

The story of Erysichthon pulls no punches. In Ovid's version of the tale, Erysichthon cuts down every tree in the sacred grove of Ceres, and the wood nymphs who live there demand revenge. On hearing about this, Ceres bids Hunger to visit Erysichthon and inflict his body with everlasting hunger: a hunger so severe that the more he eats the hungrier he will get. Nothing can satiate this hunger, despite Erysichthon ultimately selling all his worldly goods to buy food to consume. In desperation, he finally sells his daughter, Mestra, who discovers at this point a talent for shapeshifting, a skill that Erysichthon determines to use to trick traders who think they are buying a slave to give him money. But still the hunger won't go away. If you take this story to its logical conclusion, there is only one possible ending, which is indeed what happens: Erysichthon's hunger is such that the only relief is for him to consume himself, until nothing is left.

This melodrama sets three scenes from the story to texts written by the poet John McAuliffe. It was written for a project funded by the University of Manchester, in association with Creative Manchester, and produced by Manchester Opera Project.

Libretto

(i) Erysichthon's Proposal

Erysichthon: Mestra

Mestra: Father

Erysichthon: Here we are, at my old wood, my wood, where, as a child, you played

Mestra: I did, father,

Erysichthon: By this old oak, Mestra,
I remember it too, hatching plans here...

Mestra: Remember the acorns I'd pick from the oak for you.
And bare winter days, I'd climb it into the blue.
Coming here I felt like part of its family It's good to be back under this tree.

Erysichthon: And I'm still making plans, and where better to tell you.

Mestra: What is this plan, father, I heard you roaring earlier,
At the supervisor, on the factory floor?

Erysichthon: Mestra, listen. This land is paid for, mine, Ours. If I plan to burn it down And tear the earth, I can, it's mine.

Mestra: Is that your plan, father?

Erysichthon: The wood I cut, Mestra, I will not burn; this wood will be the makings of a new town, and best of all, the wedding hall where one day you will be married.

Mestra: Where I get married?

Erysichthon: A shining, gleaming wedding hall, in the middle of my new town
perched on that little hill, overlooking all I own.

Mestra: Father, its true that the Planner decides,
but this wood, father,
is it not sacred?
Sacred to a god,
the god who must bless
a wedding hall.

Erysichthon: Forget Her! Watch me make,
with my bare hands and this sharp axe, your shining gleaming wedding hall
in the middle of my new town,
perched on that little hill,
overlooking all I own.

(ii) Erysichthon's Axe

My axe waits for the oak, its fat shadow on the field,
its point growing
on the blue and clouds and the tinkling glitter of its swaying ornaments

what crosses me and mine I will take out under this same discriminating tree you fear, which spreads, year on year,
across my forecast growth.

No one gets to sit this out, all are part of my big picture, that I'll hang on my word. Here is the strong trunk and branch of my nights and years

this gleam I'll take to the obscure hours
which filter light
and baffle sound:
what presides over us
will end

with this sharp question making its impossible offer.

(iii) Mestra's Lament

Where's the tree I hid under, branches robins warned me thinly from when he'd seek me out, my father?

who will bring him to his senses?
in this massacre of branches, where the robin once was?

now the earth's a bare drum, clear as a horizon
his step lands heavily on.

where I must follow him, through the forest's slaughter, my father's daughter.
